Additional Information

Teaching Philosophy

One of the keys to the development of an individual is continuous education acquired and its subsequent application during their lifetime. This applies to all levels from youth through adult. In our dynamic society involving a continued increase in demand for education, the development of the student through life-long learning is imperative.

It is the job of the educator to serve as a leader, counselor, facilitator, guide, friend, mentor, and information source to the student. Every student comes to the classroom with varying backgrounds, abilities, goals, and attitudes to be analyzed by the educator in development of a program to best help the student to succeed. This is especially true for the adult student, where a number of life learning experiences as well as past employment learning come with the student to class. The educator and institution must develop a dynamic, multi-based, information transmission format, which best serves the majority of the students while allowing the flexibility to adapt to the “special” needs which each student bring to the classroom.

Adult students need to function from a very organized, project plan format in respect to course studies. This allows the student to schedule and prepare to the best of their abilities to meet the demands of the coursework, lives at work, and home. The adult student also needs interactive experiences during the education process, which run parallel to the demands of the work place. This is especially true in the light of acquired and applied technical skills.
